Dear Ted,

The production department is currently sorting through all the tangibles that went into Computer Lib/Dream Machines and getting a package together for you. We want to be sure that we have copies or originals of any materials that will be necessary to make corrections for any subsequent printings or translations.

I understand that you wish to have copies of our final disks because you retained the electronic rights to put Computer Lib on "a system of the Author's design". (I gather this means Xanadu.) The standard practice at Microsoft Press, and throughout the publishing industry, is to charge a fee for copies of our disks. They are, after all, the fruit of great labor by our production department.

Given that you only plan to put the book up on your own system, I would like to propose that, in lieu of your paying us the standard fee for the electronic disks, you include a screen which informs users that Computer Lib/Dream Machines is published by Tempus Books of Microsoft Press and is available at a local bookstore, or by phoning 800-638-3030.

I can send you the specific language. Please let me know your thoughts on this.

Finally, a reminder that the unused portions of COMPUTER LIB/DREAM MACHINES cannot appear in book form until six months after the publication date of our edition.

I look forward to seeing you in San Francisco.

Best,

Anne E. Depue
